What is the relationship between assessment and instruction? How can we design assessment and instruction so that they work together to actively engage students in the learning process, address students' learning styles, and raise achievement levels?

In this two-day institute, Rick Stiggins, author of An Introduction to Student-Involved Classroom Assessment and a renowned expert on formative assessment, joins his work with Dr. Harvey Silver, author of The Strategic Teacher and a leader in research-based instructional strategies. In synthesizing these two bodies of work, Rick and Harvey will present a powerful new model of thoughtful assessment and instruction that really works. Joyce Jackson, a school-improvement specialist, will show how this unified approach to instruction and assessment is helping schools raise achievement.

You will learn:

- The difference between assessment of learning and assessment for learning.
- Assessment strategies and techniques that engage students in learning and increase the sense of partnership between teachers and students.
- How to make the link between assessment and instruction so that teaching is aligned to students' strengths and needs.
- A set of research-based instructional strategies proven to raise achievement and address all students' learning styles.
- A powerful framework that allows teachers to design and deliver units that are assessment driven, instructionally sound, and that motivate students to do their best work.
